This is what Adam and Eve learned in the Garden of Eden.

When they ate from the Tree of Knowledge, the knowledge they got was that one day they were going to die. Before the forbidden fruit they didn't even know death was part of the equation.

When Adam & Eve learn that life is finite, that they will die (an insight by the way that is the key characteristic that separates human beings from all other living creatures.) they go from being children to grownups. Maturity is knowing that you are going to die and living accordingly.

When Adam and Eve realize one day they will die God kicks them out of the Garden – not as punishment but as a blessing. The clock is ticking and living in your parent's house as a grownup, which is really what the Garden of Eden is for them, is really no way to live. Some of us know that first hand.

And what's the very next line in the Torah, the first thing they do East of Eden? "And Adam knew his wife Eve and she bore him a son". They have a child – the very realization of "I'm not going to live forever." - immortality through progeny.
